Katherine Morris specialises in occupational health and safety law, as well as having a strong background in employment and industrial relations law, having worked in the area since the beginning of 2000. Katherine has assisted government entities and private sector clients across various industry sectors, including transport, construction, rail, property ownership and management, banking, retail, engineering and health care services.

Katherine's experience in occupational, health and safety has been balanced between advising in relation to OHS management systems, the defence of WorkCover prosecutions and general advice. Most recently, Katherine's experience has been focused on the review of safety management systems. In relation to litigation, Katherine's experience includes both defended hearings and pleas. Katherine also has considerable experience in dealing with WorkCover NSW investigations.

Katherine has completed a Masters of Law with a focus on occupational health and safety, and conducts regular training and seminars to clients groups and industry professionals on a range of safety related matters. Some of these seminars include the regular 'Safety Seminar Series' hosted by Deacons on key OHS issues.

Katherine has completed a Certificate IV in Workplace Assessment & Training and has a certificate in OHS General Induction for Construction Work in NSW.

Katherine is regularly asked to speak at a variety of industry conferences concerning OH&S, sits on the Property Council of Australia's building services committee as the OHS legal expert and is a member of the Australian Human Resources Institute's WHS Special Interest Group.
